An interdisciplinary review of the nutritional status of all older people in a health care district revealed that at least one in five were undernourished. Nutritional assessment enabled the identification of those older people who were at particular risk. Based on this information, an intervention was devised which involved the provision of group based nutritional counselling for those at high risk followed by individual care for those who required intensive support. The study design and the process of implementing the intervention are presented and the effectiveness of the process noted. The study could not demonstrate any evidence of the effectiveness of the intervention on the nutritional status of the elderly, although the study had some methodological limitations. "This is our most important city and we do not want any of our citizens to feel any fear and confusion around this emergency. ... We need to get out of this state and back home to our families and our communities." Gov. Malloy's declaration of emergency in the city is the first in Connecticut since Hurricane Irene in 2011. Officials said the storm strengthened throughout the day, first reaching maximum sustained winds of 115 mph as it moved north of the North Fork of the Pomfret River around 7 p.m. The storm's maximum winds were estimated to be as high as 130 mph. "This is a big concern because we do not want to have the benefit of that (130 mph) wind," said Asbury Park Police Chief John Mitchell. "We're trying to have everybody stay in their house." Initially, the eye of the hurricane was forecast to pass east of the city and slip into the Atlantic Ocean, said Barbara Clemente, a spokeswoman for the National Weather Service in Upton. But the hurricane strengthened throughout the night
